Highfield Park

A Brief History

The manor of Heckfield, the name by which Highfield was previously known, dates back as far as the Domesday Survey when it formed part of the possessions of Hugh de Port. The manor and its grounds have of course changed over the years including a deer park added in 1328, an avenue of lime trees in 1759 and walled gardens and fishing lakes in the 18th century.

Notable families who called Highfield home included the Creswells, Sturt and the Pitt family. You will find some of our former residents still watching over their beloved home as their final resting place is next door in St Michaels churchyard.

In 1757 the house, then still known as Heckfield House, and its surrounding estate was incorporated into the neighbouring estate of Stratfield Saye, owned by the Pitt family and visited by Queen Charlotte. We know that Robert Adams, architect, redesigned the house we see today for the Pitt family in 1760. There is a painting of Adams hanging in the Saye in Highfield Park today.

In 1818 as part of improvements to his own home a local landowner, Charles Shaw-Lafevre negotiated with the then owners to rename the house as their own home was called Heckfield Place and so Highfield Park was created.

After its change of name Highfield Park remained part of the Stratfield Saye estate for many years and was known as the Dower House for the estate. It had many residents during this time including and was a much loved country home for those who lived here. One such resident was Neville Chamberlain, who moved in early in 1940, during his residency he was visited by King George VI and Queen Elizabeth. War Cabinet member and former Prime Minister Chamberlain died of cancer on the 9th Nov 1940, aged 71 and is buried at Westminster Abbey. There is a memorial to Chamberlain close to the North door in St Michaels church.

The building left the Wellington Estate and was sold to become a business rather than a family home. Highfield House as it was known on the sales documents was purchased by Style Conferences in 1980. Highfield Park Conferences Ltd opened its doors as a conference centre on the 4th July 1983. Between 1980 and 2016 the venue was managed by several different companies until it was purchased in April 2016 by its current owners and became the independently owned country house hotel you visit today.
